

Known fondly as the Harry Potter clock by fans who visit Kings Cross Station. Restored in 2012, it was originally two separate dials, separated by steel rods and located astride a footbridge.

As if taking its cue from a Harry Potter story, the footbridge and the clock disappeared. In reality our team worked overnight to remove the clock then transport it to our Derby workshop.

We then worked our own magic, designing and building a new cantilevered support bracket, mirroring the style of another in the station.

Meanwhile the dials and case were skilfully restored and equipped with synchronous movements and backup unit wizardry to ensure year-round reliability. Then, unseen by anyone but our installation team, the clock reappeared one night in its new location.

Client: Network Rail
Location: Kings Cross Station, London
Size: 2m diameter
Materials: Gold leaf, acrylic paint, brass, LED illumination
Date: 2012
Ref: 4023

SMITH OF DERBY
CLOCKMAKERS • EST. 1856

+44 (0)1332 345569
enquiries@smithofderby.com
www.smithofderby.com